WHEN THE WRITING CAN'T
BE MORE THAN 150 WORDS:

The first that should've appeared between inverted commas, to mark it's a word that you are mentioning.

Change in font color: context vs dialog

Relay relation + pun intended (Clara = carácter omitted; Clara = resolute (Spanish))

'that' highlighted in red consistently in both pictures

Narrative from top to bottom

Clara ends up 'omitted'

Concise hashtags, just descriptive

Grammatical explanation: In defining relative clauses, you can omit 'that', 'who', and 'which' when these are the object of a sentence. However, when the clause is non-defining, they can't Narrative: from top to bottom. Image in between needed to understand it all.

Intertextual references: Harry Potter

'wanted'
Western movie posters iconic aesthetics

Relay text: beware, as if you see him, chances are he will probably have seen you first.

Ferran as the wizard
→ teachers see many things they don't tell their students about...

What's #momaso?

Grammatical explanation: Every teacher is mad when students use "witch" instead of "which".

"every single teacher" → for emphasis. 'All teachers are mad' → correct

Mistake caused by homophone words

Inverted commas needed for 'witch' and 'which', used, though in the grammatical explanation

Narrative: from top to bottom, image needed

Font type not 'meme' like

When you finish a relative clauses exam

and you have forgotten the commas

Exaggerated scenario.

Text-image → Relay relation.

Full stop missing.

Grammatical explanation: When we use non-defining relative clauses, we must put them between commas. That's because you give extra information, it's like when we are using brackets.

Intertextual reference. If not familiar with HP, you don't know what this scene is about.

'the sentence' → unnecessary

Not meme-like font type

When the teacher asks you to translate an easy sentence.

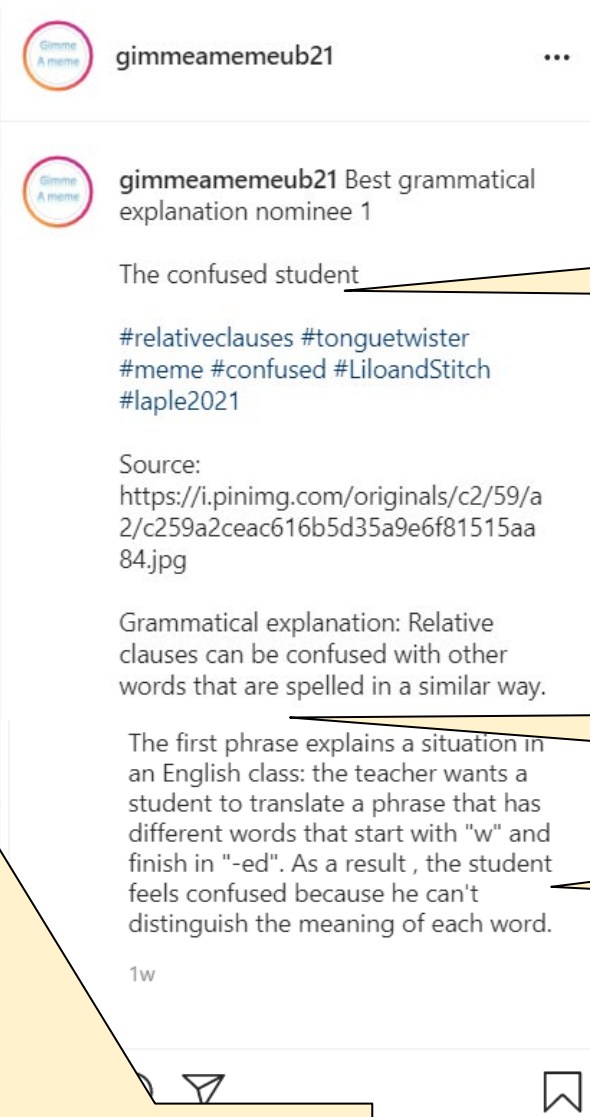

The sentence:

'which' should be 'who'

Cacophony + alliteration: /w/, /tʃ/, /ɪ / vs. /i:/ → #tonguetwister

It's not a sentence but a noun phrase. The main verb is missing.

Anchorage relation

It's not a 'phrase' but temporal clause.

Not only the meaning but the function within the phrase.

Narrative from top to bottom.

Typical meme-like font type & color

Self-explanatory. No words needed. More effective for humorous purposes.

Anchorage relation text-image though unrelated to the denouement.

Intertextual reference for humor purposes.

Clara can't have heard the sentence in full to make such a mistake. We don't see Clara confused here, either.

Full stop missing.

Would've been funnier if something about Clara had been added, like 'Heidi may leave the Alps. Clara won't. Deffo.'

Heidi may leave the Alps

#letsgotothebeach #modalverb #abrilcerral #mayheidi #lapple202

Source: <https://imgflip.com/i/58xq>

Grammatical explanation: Heidi wants to go to the beach, but she isn't sure about it; for this reason she uses "may", which is a modal verb of possibility. May is a modal verb, but also a month of the year. That's why Clara is confused.

Grammatical explanation: We can use which or that to talk about things. But. in non-defining relative clauses, which are separated by commas, we can't use that.

No the most thorough of captions. → descriptive relation?

Inverted commas in 'which' or 'that' missing.

Should be: 'which' is separated...
